

all the time. Spending 20, 30, 40 hours or more preparing for a job will guarantee better results.

So as we head into this long weekend in the US, do you have an interview next week? Is it your dream job? If so, you should have a really crappy weekend. One where you spend 8 hours a day preparing your behavioral examples, preparing your open-ended frameworks, and practicing answering questions, ideally with another human being. Does this sound like way too much? If so, then you don't want the job. Giving up one long weekend to land your dream job can absolutely change the rest of your life. So, who is ready for a crappy weekend!?!? Good luck!

---

Written by

Jeff H'S post

   26  7